The way religions deal with gender issues and transidentity is in demand as never before – and yet often seems precarious and conflictual to us. Which views from Judaism and Christianity can open up new perspectives here? Which discourses shape the question of gender and identity in the respective religions? Which theological traditions do the argumentations fall back on and how can we figure out new insights out of these traditions? And finally: What can Judaism and Christianity learn from each other in this complex of topics in favour of a genuine role as allies in society?
